Lucho:

I like my job, but my biggest problem on the work site is that the older blokes that I work with make homophobic comments. Most of the time it's casual stuff, and they don't realize what they're saying. Other times, it's deliberate.

Lucho:

I'm not gay, but my brother is. I live with him, so I always hear stories of how he gets a rough time. I love my brother, and I wanna stick up for him, and I feel like shit that I don't say anything at work. But if I say something, it'll make work uncomfortable.

Lucho:

This has been going on for years. At the beginning, I could just ignore it. But the longer it goes on, the angrier I feel. I wanna quit, but the same thing could just happen at the next job. I don't feel like I can say anything to anyone, because all the older blokes are mates of the boss, and it'll just fall on deaf ears. I avoid spending too much time with them, which slows me down at work. I can tell they're getting pissed off.
